History comes to Wembley — and you can too

We have tickets for two lucky readers to watch the Barbarians as they try to avenge Britain's defeat at the hands of Australia 100 years ago

It has taken 100 years, but early next month a British club will have the chance to avenge a crushing Olympic rugby defeat at the hands of the Australians. And you can win the opportunity to help them to that victory.

In 1908, there were only two sides in the Olympic Games rugby competition: Australia and Britain, represented by Cornwall, the English county champions. With London hosting the Games, a strong home crowd at the old White City

Stadium still failed to give their team the edge, and Cornwall were defeated 32-3.

On December 3 the Barbarians, the famous invitation team, will take on Australia at Wembley Stadium in a match organised by the British Olympic Association to mark the centenary of the Olympic final. Young Times is able to offer two lucky readers the opportunity to join the Barbarians as their mascots, watched by their families. All you have to do is answer the following question:

Champions Australia's gold medal from the 1908 Olympics

Which country does the Barbarians captain, Richie McCaw, play for?

Send your answers to youngtimes@thetimes.co.uk before Friday, November 21 for your chance to win.

Can you remember which film these quotes are from?

Chad: How can you expect the rest of us to be focused on a game when you're off somewhere in leotards singing 'Twinkle Town'...

Troy: No one said ANYTHING about leotards.

Chad: Not yet my friend, but just you wait.
